test of distributed automotive embedded systems

Modern automotive electronic control systems are distributed, networked embedded systems. Diagnostic routines implemented on individual components cannot adequately identify the true cause of anomalous behavior because their view is restricted to component-local information.

Diagnosis in Automotive Systems: A Survey

Automotive embedded systems have developed heterogeneous distributed architectures over time because of the size, weight, and power consumption (SWaP) for cost and high performance benefits [3].

Distributed Computing for Functional Safety of Automotive

The significance of embedded software systems in the automotive domain has increased dramatically during the last ten years.

(PDF) Reuse of software in distributed embedded automotive

The terms and the processing model of the PLP are applied on reuse of software by an automotive manufacturer. Figure 3 shows the components of the presented framework.

As many embedded systems are powered by rechargeable batteries, the goal is to extend, as much as possible, the autonomy of the system. Recently, many scheduling ... Minimizing energy consumption is an important issue in the design of real-time embedded systems.
