The End of the RNA World Is Near, Biochemists Argue. The modern cell assigns these responsibilities to its DNA and its proteins, respectively "but according to the narrative that dominates origin-of-life research and biology-textbook descriptions today, RNA was the first to play that role, paving the way for DNA and proteins to take over later.

The RNA World Hypothesis is a concept put forth in the 1960s by Carl Woese, Francis Crick and Leslie Orgel. It proposes that earlier life forms may have used RNA alone for the storage of genetic material. Walter Gilbert, a Harvard molecular biologist, was the first to use the term "RNA World" in an article published in 1986.
